

ABSTRACT

A genotype-independent method for efficiently carrying out pollen-mediated gene transformation of maize or monocots is described. Using pollen which is pretreated with silicon carbide and transforming DNA coding for specific traits, the method can produce transformed plants exhibiting useful traits, with high efficiency and reproducibility.